Supporting people with complex personality disorder

Have your say

The NHS wants to provide safe, good quality care that everyone can use. Any time there might be an important change to health services, the NHS asks local people, families and organisations for their views. This helps the NHS decide what to do next.

The NHS is asking for your views about services for adults with complex personality disorder. We want to have an ‘outreach team’ based in your local area that helps people closer to home. As well as this, there could be ‘live in’ services in one or more areas. There are four different options being considered – or you might have other ideas about how to organise care.

What you say will make a difference
